

streams of people were on their way to the vicinity of the boathouses. Motors, cabs, hacks and street cars sped on their way with their living freights, all bent on seeing the regatta, for the rivalry owing to the importation of new boats, and the acquisition of new members, was keener than it has been for years past. The committees at the boathouses made all visitors welcome, and the rivalry to entertain the guests seemed to be just as great as the struggle for supremacy was on the water. A lot, of course, did not get invitations to the boathouses, but these found excellent spots along the wharves, the pontoons, or anywhere that was
