

Waikiki Diver Injured:

A well-known Honolulu merchant dived from the Outrigger float, missing the crest of the wave and dived into the shallow trough, where there was only a few feet of water. His hands struck bottom, while his legs and hips were still above water. The sudden jar partially dislocated one of the lower vertebrae in his spine, and the resulting nerve pressure caused intense pain in the lower part of his back.

After several days the pain became unbearable, and he consulted F. C. Mighton, Chiropractor, who has offices at 204-205 Boston Building. One simple chiropractic adjustment of the subluxated vertebra removed the nerve pressure, and the pain has gone.

“Several cases of so-called ‘broken necks’ from diving into shallow water, have been totally restored through Chiropractic,” said F. C. Mighton.—Advertisement.
