

OUTRIGGER CORAL IS FINDING WAY BACK

Last Sunday's Harvest Remains On Beach At Waikiki

Is the Outrigger Canoe Club to start a coral garden? is the question asked these days by frequenters of the well known Waikiki beach resort.

Last Sunday the club had a coral hunt and the collection, which measures ten feet long, six wide and four high, has remained ever since on the ground, where it was deposited. As coral specimens the crop is not rated high, for it is all dead coral, without life and without the hues which make the real article brilliant.

The worst of it all is that small boys, taking the waters at the beach the past few days, have been picking handy coral bits and seeing how far into the sea they can throw the missiles. In this manner the coral is gradually finding its way back into its native element.

Those who have watched proceedings at the Outrigger have been wondering why so many hundred enthusiasts labored gratuitously and earnestly last Sunday.
