

A Grand Old Club

They may have talked (but no more) of the fine clubs of Biarritz, along the Riviera, on the Dalmatian coast. Those days are of the dead past. Now many an American is re-discovering the romantic charm of his own lands. Yet, in those lush days when European clubs were the play spots of kings and princes, Honolulu's Outrigger Canoe Club had something they could not offer.

It was the brain child of Alexander Hume Ford. Immediately upon its beginning it became a happy adjunct to Honolulu life. There on the golden sands of Waikiki young swimmers and surfers were developed. Boys and girls met for many carefree hours in the open, cultivating strength and virility of mind and body.

Today, in its new building on the same old premises at Waikiki, the Outrigger club is more attractive than ever. The men with vision behind the club are to be congratulated.

Hume Ford, resting and living happily on Maui, far from the scene of his earlier labors, did much for Honolulu, but nothing more notable than his beginning of the Outrigger Canoe Club. His ideas go marching on at the Outrigger. He will not be forgotten at the grand opening June 11. What finer monument could any man wish?
